The Battle of Salamis

The Battle of Salamis was a conflict between Persia and the Greek city states, it was fought in September 480 BC. The battle was fought in the straits of Salamis, between the island of Salamis and the Greek city Piraeus. Themistocles led the Greeks into battle and Xerxes I led the Persians into battle. When the battle started, Xerxes set up a golden throne and watched from the shore expecting the Persians to win. The Persians massively outnumbered the Greeks. The Greeks had around 400 ships whereas the Persians had around 1200 ships. The battle lasted 12 hours, around 50,000 men died most of which were Persians, the Greeks sank around 400 ships while the Persians sank 40 ships. One reason for so many Persian ships sinking was that the Greeks had Triremes. Triremes were a type of ships they were very fast. The front of them had strong bronze used to smash into other ships and sink them. Triremes took 170 men to row. After the Greeks won, the Persians retreated to Asia. The Greeks winning meant that the Persians could not conquer the Peloponnese.

The lovers fallout

Puck leads Helena to Demetrius, whereupon Lysander appears and restates his love for Helena. When Demetrius who is sleeping close by, wakes up and sees Helena, he too falls madly in love with her, under the influence of the magic flower. Helena now thinks she is being made fun of by both young men.

When Hermia appears, she accuses Helena of being in on the joke as well. Hermia also thinks Lysander is mocking Helena; when she asks him to stop, Lysander turns on her. Hermia then turns on Helena, thinking that she has seduced Lysander with her wights.

All four lovers almost come to blows, at which point Oberon appears and freezes them where they stand. By now utterly furious, Oberon commands Puck to lead the lovers through the forest until they all fall asleep and then charms Lysander's eyes so that he might fall in love with Hermia again. Puck surmounts a thick fog and prepares to lead the lovers their separate ways through the wood.
